I'm currently building out a new site in Drupal 7 and I'm looking for general best practice. I'm using a combination of MySQL and Doctrine to build out my models / controllers. The front-end is based off of Zend Framework. Let's say I want to make a list of the most recent event stored for a particular user (i.e. a user's most recent Home and Away games). There are two ways I could do this: Each user has a row in a MySQL table that contains the most recent Home and Away games for that user. The user might have 10 rows for 10 most recent games. Every user has a MySQL table with two columns: Home and Away. The Home column would contain the most recent Home event. The Away column would contain the most recent Away event. These two approaches seem radically different to me. In the first approach, I would be storing information in a table that's only related to the front-end part of my application. In the second approach, it's related to the back-end database. I'm wondering what do you think is the best approach for storing data like this? A: I would go with your first approach with a trigger on the db that writes every row to a column when you insert a new row. The second one is for advanced usage so it would be something like: "user has many events and events belongs to user". But, it seems to me that you should be able to do something like that with the first approach.
